Not every couple wants a wedding with hundreds of guests. More and more people in the Daleville area are choosing smaller celebrations with only close family and friends, and they want a venue that feels just as special for 40 people as it does for 200. A farm setting is often ideal, because the landscape fills the space that a big crowd would otherwise occupy.

Bailey Wick Farm Wedding & Event Venue in Fincastle, about ten miles north of Daleville, offers several ways to scale a wedding down. A small ceremony on the open grounds with the Blue Ridge Mountains behind you, followed by dinner on the covered porch or in part of the barn, can feel personal and relaxed without losing any of the scenery.

Intimate weddings also leave more room in the budget for the details that matter to you. With fewer guests, you might invest in a memorable dinner, a talented photographer or a longer celebration. The venue provides tables and chairs, so you can focus on linens, flowers and food instead of rentals.

Making a Small Wedding Feel Full

With a smaller group, arrange seating so everyone feels close together. A single long farm table near the gas log fireplace, or a few tables grouped beneath the antler chandelier, creates a warm, dinner party atmosphere. Consider having guests share stories during the meal instead of formal toasts, and plan time on the porch rocking chairs for slow conversation.

The comfort features of the barn matter just as much for small weddings. Heating, air conditioning and two dressing rooms let the couple get ready on site and stay comfortable in any season. Reviewers have also mentioned how attentive Mr. Bailey was during planning, and that personal attention can be especially meaningful for a small, close-knit celebration.
